Award-winning spin-out companies, educational excellence and the restoration and provision of world-class facilities are just a few elements of the legacy that the University of Greenwich at Medway has created since its inception 10 years ago.

We are acting as a catalyst for change

Since first opening its Medway Campus at Chatham Maritime in the mid-1990s, the University of Greenwich has been in the business of raising standards, profiles and educational achievement in an area that had suffered in the past from under investment.

Thanks to one of the most innovative educational partnerships in the country – the £50 million Universities at Medway project – the region is now host to some of the finest educational facilities available in the UK both for Higher and Further education. Through a number of different research schemes and projects, ground-breaking work is being carried out linking academia to the business world.

Greenwich’s Director of Regional Development Professor Alan Reed, said: “Driving regeneration through education was never going to be a quick and easy fix. By providing local people with higher education opportunities and a raft of courses specifically tailored to meet the needs of local industry and community services such as health and social care, we are acting as a catalyst for change. ▶
